GENERAL INFORMATION ON CENSUS RECORDS 1841 - 1901

Census records, like records of civil registration & parish records, are a key source of information for family historians. Census reveal who was living at a particular address in a particular place on census night.

Every ten years, the census provides researchers with a snapshot of individuals and families across the nation. It shows each person's name, relationship to the head of household, age, and much more. The various census provide a critical link between government registered births, marriages and deaths (after 1837) and parish registers of baptism, marriage and burial.

A national census has been taken every ten years in England and Wales since 1801, excluding 1941. Instead, in 1941 a national registration took place and national identity cards were issued. The census returns for 1931 were destroyed, along with many other important records, during the Second World War.

Census for 1801 - 1831 were little more than simple head counts of the population. In addition, the administration of these early census returns was quite different. These census were the responsibility of the Overseers of the Poor.

1841 is considered the first modern census, when each householder was required to complete a census schedule giving the address of the household, the name, age, sex, occupation and place of birth of each individual residing in his or her accommodation. More importantly, administration passed into the hands of the Registrar General and the Superintendent Registrars (who were also responsible for the registration of births, marriages and deaths).

The enumerators' books from the 1841 census onwards have been preserved. These books contain names, ages, occupations and addresses, and from 1851, place of birth, marital status, the relationship of each person to the head of the household and the nature of any disabilities from which they suffered.

Apart from a few minor changes the basic structure of the census schedule did not change until 1891. In 1891, householders were then asked how many rooms (if less than five) their family occupied. Additional occupational data was also collected.

A pre-printed census schedule was left with every household and later collected by the enumerator. If there was no one in the house who could write, the enumerator helped to record the information. The census enumerator then copied the information from the schedules into their official books known as census enumerators' books. These books and the schedules were then sent to London, copied and the extracted information used for various local and national statistics.

Accuracy and Illiteracy: The census were conducted at a time when up to half the adult population were illiterate or at best, semi-illiterate. Many people would have found it difficult to read and interpret the instructions on the pre-printed schedules. Enumerators would often have found it difficult to read the poor handwriting of those who could write. This led to inaccurate, incomplete information, transcription errors, spelling variations and missing information.

Unfortunately, the individual schedules have been destroyed, so we will never know what exactly was recorded, whether a family member wrote the information themselves, whether they were able to spell, or even whether the enumerator missed information completely.

The address of a household: Identifying a household is often a problem. In towns and urban areas, few houses were numbered until the end of the nineteenth century. In many areas street names and house numbers were periodically revised. In rural areas addresses are vague or not provided at all.

Reading the Census: One great problem is trying to read the census enumerators' books. For example, in 1841, the books were completed in pencil. In later census cheap ink was used that has since bled and/or faded. Clerks who compiled and reviewed census data made a variety of marks on the returns. Many of these tally marks were written over personal information and some fields, such as ages, can be difficult to read as a result. More useful marks include a slash between households within a building and a double slash separating households in separate buildings.

Recording of Names: Researchers often have to use their imagination when attempting to link households and families across various census. Standardisation of surnames did not begin until after the registration of births, marriages and deaths began in 1837. This together with illiteracy and poor handwriting, means there were many variations in the spelling of surnames. The surname may even have been recorded phonetically.

Understanding Relationships: Although usually straightforward, the recording of relationships between members of a household can sometimes present problems when trying to identify stepchildren, relationships among lodgers, boarders and visitors. The term 'Daughter-in-law' can sometimes mean step-daughter as well as the more recognized meaning 'son's wife'. This is also true of interpreting 'son-in-law' and 'mother-in-law'. The marital status of householders is usually pretty clearly documented. The problem arises in trying to identify the spouse of a second marriage and common-law relationships. Common-law relationships are often hidden with designations such as 'visitor', 'servant' or 'lodger'.

How old? The general rule in the 1841 census was to round down the age of adults to the nearest 5 years. This rule was not always followed. Some ages were rounded down to the nearest 10 years, while others were recorded exactly. On the other hand, some people simply did not know their exact age. When the age of consent was 21, it was not unusual to find people lying about their age in order to rent accommodation or get married. At the same time, the age of a child may be falsified if that child was a worker and did not want to lose their job. For these reasons, the age recorded for an individual should always be treated with some caution.

Definition of a room: Although available from the 1891 census, information on the number of rooms in a household is not always clear. No instructions defining a 'room' are provided on the census schedule and the exact instructions given to enumerators is not readily available either. There are instances where an enumerator recorded a 1 next to the address of a family living in a house that still stands to this day, which is clearly at least 4 or 5 rooms larger.

Definition of a Household: What exactly constituted a household? This problem is particularly evident in relation to how lodgers, boarders and different families renting rooms in the same houses were enumerated.

In some instances families of lodgers appear to have been treated as occupiers in their right. In other instances it would appear multiple families sharing the same address were recorded as lodgers.

Occupations: Job titles recorded in the census are often vague. In addition, whilst people were asked how many people (if any) they employed it is usually quite difficult to differentiate between employers, self-employed and employees. The occupation of 'dressmaker' was commonly given by prostitutes.

Birth Place: The place of birth information is usually fairly accurate although some people gave as their place of birth their earliest remembered place of residence.

Medical Disabilities: The recording of medical disability is probably one type of information on the census to be suspicious of.

The information recorded was based on the following definitions: (1) Deaf and dumb (2) Blind (3) Imbecile or Idiot (4) Lunatic.

Aside from being poorly worded and inconsistent across different census, the stigmatism attached to the label "idiot" was common even in the 19th century. Many families then, as now, were reluctant to admit that another family member was an 'idiot'.
